What to Say
After the Fight:
3 Scripts That Actually Work

Created By: Baya Voce
MSW, Columbia University

Most of us were never taught how to speak the hard thing, how to tell the truth and stay connected, or how to repair after a rupture without fawning, exploding, or disappearing.

So we either go silent… or we say something we regret. We shut down, explode, over-explain, go cold, disappear, or reach too hard. This guide is for that moment.

When you're in rupture, circling it, or trying to come back from it.

Three scripts.
Real language.
No therapy-speak.
Just a way back to your partner.

Before You Reach for a Script:

3 Rules of Thumb for Coming Back Together

Repair isn't just about what you say. It's when you say it, how you say it, and what part of you is speaking.

Before you reach for a script, these 3 principles can help you create the conditions for repair to actually land.

I Pulse check: Is now a good time?

Before you initiate, check in:

Are they emotionally available enough to receive this? Are you?

If either of you is shut down, overwhelmed, or spinning, even the most skillful language won't stick. It might even escalate things.

You can ask directly:

> "I want to talk about something important. Is now okay, or should we find another time?"

You're not just managing logistics, you're tracking nervous systems. No good repair happens in fight-or-flight. Give yourselves the best shot.

2 Use “I” language. Stay inside your experience.

Statements like “You don’t care about me” or “You always shut down” put your partner on the defensive before the conversation even begins.

Try this instead:

> “The story I make up is… (that you don’t want to talk).”
> “My experience in that moment was… (feeling really alone).”
> “I noticed myself starting to spiral when… (you walked away).”

This doesn’t mean you avoid hard truths. It just means you stay rooted in what you felt, not what they did.

3 Lead with softness, not sharpness.

A soft start doesn’t mean sugarcoating. It means setting the emotional tone so your partner’s nervous system doesn’t go into lockdown five seconds in and you give yourself the highest likelihood of actually getting your needs met.

Start with your intention:

> “I want us to feel close, and I think this might be in the way.”
> “My intention isn’t to point fingers, I just want to share something that matters to me.”

You’re inviting connection, not launching a case against them. Now, for the scripts you came for…

SCRIPT ONE

When they always feel attacked

Use when:

You're trying to bring something up but your partner consistently gets defensive, shuts down, or turns it back on you.

It could sound like:

- "I can't do anything right."
- "You're always criticizing me."
- "Why are you bringing this up again?"

If you're walking on eggshells around their reactions or you find yourself over-prepping what you want to say, anticipating blowback before a word leaves your mouth, this script is for that moment.

The goal:

To reduce reactivity by signaling safety and intention up front, so the conversation doesn't derail before it starts.

When someone feels chronically "attacked," they're often in a pattern of over-personalizing feedback as threat. Your job isn't to stop telling the truth, it's to make the relational frame safer so your truth can actually land.

This isn't about minimizing what you need to say. It's about starting in a way that keeps the door open.

Say this:

> "I want to bring something up, and I can feel myself worrying that you'll hear it as an attack. That's not what I want. I'm bringing it up because it matters to me, and because I care about us."

Why this script works:

- Names the meta-moment. You're tracking what might happen before it happens, which increases emotional containment
- Centers your intention and your care, not your frustration
- Frames the conversation as relational, not adversarial

You're not denying they might feel blamed. You're naming that possibility with care and making it about connection, not correction.

Optional follow-up (to help regulate the moment):

> "Can we try to stay in this together, even if it gets a little messy?"

This is a gentle bid for co-regulation. You're asking for presence (not perfection)

If they still get defensive, say this:

> "I can feel that this isn't landing well. I don't want this to become something that drives us apart. Would it help if I said it a different way, or should we pause and try again later?"

Why this helps:

- You're noticing the derail without shaming them for it
- You're not pushing your point, you're protecting the connection
- It gives them agency, without letting them hijack the repair attempt

This is crucial when defensiveness becomes chronic: you're not walking on eggshells, you're building shared tolerance for emotionally charged moments.

Alternative phrasing:

> "Can I share something and you tell me how it lands? I'm not trying to be right, I just want to feel like we're on the same team again."

> "This might come out clunky, but I want you to know it's coming from a place of wanting more closeness, not less."

What to watch for:

This works best when you're grounded, not fuming. If your body is still activated, the script could land as manipulative or it won't help co-regulate because you're not regulated. Speak it only when your tone, breath, and pace match your intent.

Practice prompt (optional):

Before using this script, try placing a hand on your chest or belly and asking yourself:

> "What do I want them to feel as I say this?" If it's closeness or clarity, speak from that place, not from fear or frustration.

SCRIPT TWO

When you've said too much… or too little

Use when:

You exploded, shut down, or said something sharp that didn't reflect your deeper truth. Now you're sitting with the aftermath. Maybe in shame, regret, or stuck in that "should I say something or just let it blow over?" place.

This script is for the moment after rupture when you want to take responsibility but without groveling or over-apologizing.

The goal:

To repair without abandoning yourself and to show your partner that you're accountable and still want to be in connection.

This isn't about erasing your needs or pretending it didn't happen. It's about coming back into the room with a more accurate version of what you actually meant. This can sometimes be the hardest part. The moment after the mess when you know there is cleanup to do, and it takes every single ounce of "being the bigger person" you have left in you to get the courage to be the one to come back first.

Say this:

> "I've been thinking about how I showed up earlier, and that wasn't how I want to talk to you. What I meant was…"

(Then choose your ending based on what's true.)

Choose-your-own-closing (aka “What I meant was” options):

If you’ve said too much:

- “I was hurt, but it came out sharp.”
- “I was overwhelmed and trying to protect myself.”
- “I didn’t know how to say it without getting heated, so I said it with a tone I wish I didn’t use.”

If you’ve said too litte:

- “I shut down because I felt cornered, not because I don’t care. I want to do better at telling you when I need space.”
- “I pulled away because I didn’t know what to say without making it worse.”
- “I needed a second to sort through what I was feeling, and I didn’t say that clearly.”

For both:

- “I was scared I’d lose you in the moment, and I didn’t handle that fear well.”
- “I know how I said it didn’t build trust. I want to try again.”

Why this works:

- You're interrupting the pattern of defensiveness, saying too much, and silence with clarity, not self-blame or blame towards your partner.
- You're giving your partner something coherent to attach to without requiring them to fix you or jump back in immediately.
- It helps you remember what was actually underneath the escalation or shutdown.

Optional follow-up line:

> "I'm not expecting a response right now, I just didn't want to leave it like that."

This takes the pressure off. It respects their timeline. And it shows that you're not trying to erase the rupture, you're staying in connection through it.

Alternative versions:

> - "That wasn't how I want to talk to someone I love. I want to slow down and say what I actually meant."
> - "I let my tone get ahead of what I was really trying to say. Can I try again?"
> - "The way I showed up didn't make space for you, and that's not how I want to handle conflict with us."

Hot Tip:

Ending any of these phrases with a version of "can I try that again?" or "can I redo that?" is a really helpful signal that while what you have to say is important, you want to do it in a way that has the highest likelihood to stay connected.

Practice tip:

Before you reach out, try saying your script aloud with the tone you'd want to receive it in. Not the one shaped by your guilt. Not the one aimed at managing their response.Just your real voice: steady, honest, and open.

SCRIPT THREE

When you're scared to bring something up

Use when:

You're sitting on something important, like hurt, frustration, or fear, but you don't want to escalate things or be seen as too much. You've been here before: trying to "be chill," keep the peace, not stir things up. So you sit on it… and sit on it. But now the silence is starting to feel heavy.

You're stuck between two painful options:

- Say nothing and quietly carry the weight
- Say something and risk defensiveness, shutdown, or backlash

This script is for the moment before rupture, when you want to be real and stay in connection.

The goal:

To stay connected to yourself while lowering the temperature of the moment, for both of you.

This isn't just about calming them down; it's about regulating your own nervous system enough to show up clearly, gently, and without losing your center. By naming your fear out loud ("I'm nervous this might land wrong"), you disarm the instinct to over-explain, sugarcoat, or push. And in doing that, you give your partner a chance to center themselves too.
This kind of truth-telling is grounded vulnerability, and it makes space for real connection instead of walking on eggshells.

Say this:

> "There's something I want to bring up, and I'm nervous it might land wrong. I'm not trying to start a fight, I'm trying to stay close while being honest and that feels new to me. Can we talk about it?"

Why this works:

- It helps you center yourself before you speak so your tone and pacing match your intention.
- It names the moment, "I'm nervous," which invites softness instead of blame.
- It frames the conversation as a connection bid, not an attack.
- It creates co-regulation potential. When your tone slows down, theirs can too.

This script offers something many relationships don't have enough of: a soft start with a solid spine (aka truth with love).

Optional follow-up if they get reactive or distant:

> "This matters to me. I'm not bringing it up to stir something. I'm bringing it up because I don't want to keep holding it alone."

This takes the pressure off. It respects their timeline. And it shows that you're not trying to erase the rupture, you're staying in connection through it.

Alternative versions:

For softer relationships:

> "Can I share something that's been on my heart? It might come out messy, but I want to try."

For high-tension dynamics:

> "I've been holding something in and I don't want it to build more pressure. Can I bring it up and we can take a pause if it gets too charged?"

For avoidant or easily dysregulated partners:

> "There's something I want to share, and I want to do it in a way that feels safe for both of us. Is now a good time, or should we find a time that feels better?"

Practice tip:

Before speaking, place a hand on your body. Ask:

> "Can I say this from my calm, not my panic?" If the answer is no—pause. Breathe. Take the space you need to go slow. The moment deserves your clarity, not your urgency.

BONUS SCRIPT

When you're met with silence, shutdown, or "I don't know"

Use when:

You've tried to repair, or bring something up gently, and they go quiet or give you a non-response like "I don't know" or "Whatever." It's not explosive, but it lands as dismissive, and it leaves you feeling like you're out here alone, trying.

This script is for when you want to stay steady, without over-pursuing or retreating into your own silence.

Here's the emotional moment we're targeting:

- You've tried to repair or initiate.
- They shut down or go blank. They say "I don't know," "I'm fine," or just go silent.
- You're now in connection limbo: do you keep going, back off, freeze, over-function?

Say this:

> "Can I ask what's happening for you right now? I noticed you got quiet, and I don't want to assume what that means."

Why this works:

- Curiosity replaces interpretation. You're not projecting your fear onto their silence.
- You're tracking the moment without cornering them.
- The question is grounded and kind, but still invites real engagement.

This gives them space to re-enter the experience without shame or feeling blamed, and gives you information without guesswork.

Alternate versions:

> - "When you get quiet like this, I notice I start spinning a little. Is something happening on your end that I'm missing?"
> - "Is the silence about needing space, or is there something that's feeling hard to say?" "Would it feel okay if I asked what's behind the quiet right now?"
> - "If you're needing space, that's okay. Just let me know how long you need so I don't start spinning."

Why this matters:

Silence can be protest. It can be self-protection. It can be overstimulation. You don't need to decode it, you can get curious about it.

Curiosity is the bridge. It won't necessarily pull them out in the moment, but it lets them know you're still here and can wait, you're just requesting communication about when they'll be back.

Caveat: What if they say nothing's wrong?

If you ask with curiosity and they say, "I'm fine," or deny that anything's going on, don't gaslight yourself.

You might say:

> "Okay, I hear that. And if something does come up later, I'll be here to talk about it."

Then step back. Not to punish or freeze them out, but to honor your own clarity and to let them take responsibility for coming back when they're ready.
Repair takes two. You can invite it, but you can't carry the whole thing alone.

Practice tip:

Before you reach out, check your breath. Ask yourself:

> "Am I trying to fix, or am I trying to connect?"

If it's fixing, pause. If it's connection, speak slow. Let your tone hold what your words are asking for.

WHAT'S NEXT

If you're here, it probably means something hurts.

Maybe you said too much or nothing at all. Maybe you're tired of the loop, of trying to talk, only to feel misunderstood, shut down, or farther apart than when you started.

This guide wasn't meant to fix everything.
It was meant to do one small thing:
Give you a way back to come back to each other.

Because rupture is inevitable (even in the healthiest relationships), but repair is a skill. And like any skill, it can be practiced and strengthened. In fact, it must be practiced. I often say… you can't be good at Beethoven without being bad at Chopsticks first. So if you mess up, say the wrong thing, muck up a script, get triggered again even after you've taken space and come back(!!!)… all of that is completely normal. Think of it like building the muscles that we've never had to workout before. You're going to feel small and weak before you feel strong. That's just the name of the game.

That's the work I'm building next. A kind of practice group.

If this guide gave you even one moment of clarity, one phrase that made you exhale, you're exactly who I'm creating for.

So, stay close. The next step is coming soon, and you'll be the first to know.
In the work with you,

Baya Voce